Overall Framework

On the course we attend to four areas: theory, skills, practice/experience and the self. Each of these elements and the interplay between them is essential for good facilitation. It is our experience that in order to work confidently and competently, a facilitator needs

- A clear understanding and strong theoretical grasp of what they are about
- An ability to articulate what they are doing and why they are doing it
- A commitment to the values underlying facilitation and participatory practice
- A familiarity with and competence in a wide range of processes and techniques
- A willingness to review experience and reflect on practice.

Our aim is to enable participants to be better resourced (familiarity with and competence in a range of methods) and more resourceful (an enhanced ability to creatively respond to the demands and challenges of the moment).

Content

The content of what we do is negotiated with the participants so that it is relevant and pertinent to their needs. It is also informed by the experience of the course facilitators. Among the themes and issues chosen by previous groups are: designing participatory meetings, understanding key elements in group dynamics and development, facilitating participatory decision-making, facilitator styles, creative processes, power issues, managing conflict, and supporting/nourishing the self. This course will be online, and the theme of working with groups online will be part of the content.

Process

In terms of process we are mindful of three things. We like to facilitate a high level of participation, we recognise that participants will have a variety of different experiences and we are also aware that there will be a diversity of personal learning styles within the group. So we tend to draw from a wide range of methods and resources. There is an emphasis on participants drawing on and sharing their own experience and working on real-life cases and scenarios. These values continue in the way we have developed our online process.
